Abstract		Currently, face recognition system is growing sustainably on a larger scope. A few years ago, face recognition was used as a personal identification with a limited scope, now this technology has grown in the field of security, in terms of preventing fraudsters, criminals, and terrorists. In addition, face recognition is also used in detecting how tired a driver is, reducing the occurrence of road accidents, as well as in marketing, advertising, health, and others. Many method are developed to give the best accuracy in face recognition. Deep learning approach become trend in this field because of stunning results, and fast computation. However, the problem about accuracy, complexity, and scalability become a challenges in face recognition. This paper focus on recognizing the importance of this technology, how to achieve high accuracy with low complexity. Deep learning and non-deep learning methods are discussed and compared to analyze their advantages and disadvantages. From critical analysis using experiment with YALE dataset, non-deep learning algorithm can reach up to 90.6% for low-high complexity and 94.57% in deep learning method for low-high complexity. Optimization deep learning, SVM and Genetic Algorithm is proposed to overcome the problem about low accuracy and scalability.
